0.0.1 Determining binary classification of Yelp star reviews

CAPP 30254: Machine Learning for Public Policy

By: Matt Jackson group members: Aïcha Camara, Rohit Kandala, Summer Long

Our project's final output will classify tweets about the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act of 2010 ("Affordable Care Act", informally "Obamacare") as positive or negative. However, our training data – customer reviews from Yelp.com – uses ratings that are numeric (1 to 5 "stars"). In order to make apples-to-apples comparisons across the data sets, we need to ascertain where to create the cutoff in star ratings to produce a binary classification (or whether to do a ternary positive / neutral / negative classification, if data warrants that).

```python
[107]: %matplotlib inline
import matplotlib
import matplotlib.pyplot as plt

import pandas as pd
import numpy as np

from nltk.corpus import stopwords
from nltk.tokenize import word_tokenize, RegexpTokenizer from nltk import FreqDist

import re

tokenizer = RegexpTokenizer(r'\w+')
STOPWORDS = set(stopwords.words('english'))

```python
[75]: #Set filepath to match location on your machine reviews = pd.read_csv("yelp_oversample_20k_per_rating.csv").drop("Unnamed: 0", axis=1)

#Create a sub-dataset for each star rating
#TODO: Variable assignment with loop determining number/star rating
reviews_1star = reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars'] == 1), :].copy()
reviews_2star = reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars'] == 2), :].copy()
reviews_3star = reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars'] == 3), :].copy()
reviews_4star = reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars'] == 4), :].copy()
```

reviews_5star = reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars'] == 5), :].copy()

star_dfs = [reviews_1star, reviews_2star, reviews_3star, reviews_4star,␣ ↪reviews_5star]

My recommendation is informed by two methodologies: a more subjective analysis of the most common words at each star rating, and a more automated analysis of sentiment scores at the review level using the popular VADER toolkit.

0.0.2 Subjective most-common-words assessment

We find the most common unique words in each star rating, perhaps filtering down to sentiment-inflected words, to see if we can intuit an apt cutoff value between star ratings.

          Excludes stopwords.

          Inputs:

        star ratings (e.g. for the 1-star reviews, return words that occur

Explore the print output above as you see fit. In general, the most useful sets of words appear to be the truly unique words from settings at n=100 on up.

One issue with using the "truly unique" words is that, especially at 2- and 3-star ratings, there aren't very many of them.

On the other hand, using the "not at every star rating" words results in many words in isolation that might have very different sentiment valence in-context: e.g., the positive word 'great' may appear often in 2-star reviews, but in negative phrases like "the food really wasn't great".

In general, as one might expect, sentiment words at the 3-star range appear to be intermediary ("moderate", "decent") and words that don't fit a sentiment valence especially well. It does seems as though the especially negative words are much more prevalent at 2-star and below than they are at 3-star or above.

0.0.3 Notes / Directions for future analysis

If I could do this over again / had more time at this stage of exploratory analysis, here are some more leads that I might pursue:

- Create a longer and more detailed list of stopwords to eliminate things from Yelp review text that are unlikely to occur in tweets about the Affordable Care Act (e.g. the many named foods, city names, common first names and surnames, occupation-specific words like "waitress"). This would get more sentiment-laden words about general customer reaction into the list of most common words, and make it easier to evaluate the data for sentiment at sight.
- Bag-of-words sentiment analysis on the groups of most common words by star rating – this could produce a sentiment score that allowed for deciding a cutoff in a less subjective fashion (or, at least, in a fashion that outsources the subjective judgment to a robust, peer-approved software library)
- Plot the "n" for n most common words vs. how many words are unique to each star rating at that n (a different trendline for each star rating). It might be interesting to see if the trend is sublinear as a higher n means more common words overlap across the subsamples.

By convention, VADER scores over 0.05 are treated as 'positive', under -0.05 as 'negative', and between -0.05 and 0.05 as 'neutral.'

By the looks of it, only 1-star reviews have negative mean and/or median. This suggests that it may make sense to isolate 1-star reviews as 'negative' while counting all others as 'positive'. However, each star rating has a very high standard deviation for VADER score, and all star ratings have a median quite distinct from the mean, which suggests that plotting the shape of the data may provide additional insight. Let's do that.

[140]:  #fig, ax = plt.subplots(sharex=True)

        #ax = reviews_1star.plot.hist(column='vader_scores', alpha=0.5, color='red')

reviews_5star['vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.5, color='blue', bins=100) reviews_4star['vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.6, color='green', bins=100) reviews_3star['vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.7, color='yellow', bins=100) reviews_2star['vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.8, color='orange', bins=100) reviews_1star['vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.6, color='red', bins=100)

The weights seem very off here, with almost all ratings in the highly positive range. This suggests to me that maybe doing the compound polarity score separately on each star rating was skewing the results. So I tried it again, doing compound polarity score for the entire original reviews dataframe and then seeing if the distribution changed:

[128]:
reviews.loc[:,'vader_scores'] = reviews.loc[:,'text'].apply(lambda x:
                                                      sent_analyzer.
↪polarity_scores(x)['compound'])

[141]:
```
reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars']==5),'vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.5,␣ ↪color='blue', bins=100)
reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars']==4),'vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.6,␣ ↪color='green', bins=100)
```

reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars']==3),'vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.7,␣ ↪color='yellow', bins=100)
reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars']==2),'vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.8,␣ ↪color='orange', bins=100)
reviews.loc[(reviews.loc[:,'stars']==1),'vader_scores'].hist(alpha=0.6,␣ ↪color='red', bins=100)

[141]: <AxesSubplot: >

It didn't.

The pattern for all ratings above 1 is a sharp left-skew (large peak on right end of distribution), whereas the pattern for 1-star reviews has a modest right-skew (small peak on left end). The peak for 2-star reviews, however, is substantially lower than the peaks for 3 to 5 stars, and both 2-star and 1-star reviews have some noticeable number of reviews along the entire gamut from -1.00 to 1.00.

0.0.5 Notes / directions for future analysis

- Analyze how the VADER compound polarity scores work, to see why they're so skewed for this data set / figure out how "train" VADER so Yelp review scores aren't tilted so far towards extreme scores
- Plot negative, positve, and neutral VADER score components on separate charts, to see if the scores underlying the compound number have their own interesting trends that don't show up in the compound score data

0.1   Recommendation

If we were looking at things from a merely statistical standpoint using the VADER compound score, it might make sense to set the cutoff between 1-star and 1-star. However, the assessment of common words for the 2-star reviews brings up a lot of intensely negative terms, such as (to look at truly unique words in the 1000 most common) 'flavorless', 'rushed', 'raw', 'stale', 'tasteless', 'uncomfortable', and 'annoyed.' I don't want to discount that impression.

Therefore: My official recommendation is that, for the remainder of this project, we classify Yelp reviews with 3 or more stars as "positive" ($label = 1$), and all others (1 or 2 stars) as "negative" ($label = 0$), with no "neutral" category. This will capture the sharp jump in positivity scores at the 3-star level and the subjective assessment that 2-star reviews have significantly more negative terms even if the naive settings for VADER didn't recognize them as such. It will also enable us to use binary classification methods, which build most directly on the course material covered thus far.

As we proceed, though, we should keep in mind that the Yelp star reviews are a rather messy, lossy measure (which makes sense, as different users don't have to follow the same standards when deciding how to review an establishment), and simplifying them to a binary classification introduces even more mess and loss. Some of our labels may strike us "incorrect" or "misleading" in ways that we can't really adjust going forward. As such, we shouldn't be surprised if it is difficult to obtain high accuracy in classification models.
